EDITOR'S NOTE

GOODBYE, FAREWELL AND AMEN

A little less than three years ago, a 19-year-old kid packed up his life into a 1998 Dodge Caravan. He wore a green hat and was crying, partly because his freshman year was over but mostly because of a severe dust-mite allergy. He didn't clean his room that often. Earlier that day, there had been hugs and handshakes as his floor-mates, his family, left for the summer, one by one. He stood in the middle of the empty room, sweat soaked and sniffing, looking out the window at the sunset. Because he was the only one on the floor, he said out loud to himself, "Well, that's one year down."

That kid was me, more or less. In the intervening years, through a series of fortunate and less-than-fortunate events, that kid became me. Now, I'm getting ready to pack up again. Not my dorm, or my room, but my office. My notepads, my coffee pot, my cough syrup, and a box full of back-up articles.

I will not be doing any crying this time. Because as much as I'll miss this little closet of an office and this page where I ramble every week, it's time to go. It's time to get back to what I really enjoy, what I haven't had time to do in a year. It's time to get back to writing, to get back to taking an interview while driving down the highway, to get back to why I fell in love with this magazine in the first place.

While I won't be graduating until the end of this quarter, I will forever look back at these past 30 issues as my last year of college. This note is my graduation speech, my farewell to all of you wonderful people. Though I have probably poked fun at, insulted or outright yelled at each and every one of you, you, our faithful readers, are wonderful. Because without you, we're nothing but a stack of colorful toilet paper.

Andy Rees

EDITOR IN CHIEF

P.S. Don't worry, I'm not leaving just yet. I mean, what graduation would be complete without a graduation party? I'll see you kids next week in 2010's Distorter.

ALPHA PHI OMEGA SHANTYTOWN

by Brendan Cahill | Photographs by Steve Pfost

Students walking down the Quarter Mile

between March 10 and 12 might have been surprised to see a group of students living out of cardboard boxes. It was a rather impressive sight — a set of interconnected boxes filling the space next to the tiger statue. A handful of students stood in front of the large cardboard-and-duct-tape structure asking for donations. This raised questions including: Why would someone do that? Have they fallen on hard times? Or perhaps, have the fraternities finally hit rock bottom?

RIT's chapter of Alpha Phi Omega, a co-ed community service fraternity, decided to build themselves a cardboard shantytown to raise awareness and money for families who have loved ones in the hospital. The fraternity, chartered at RIT in 1963, has a history of making dramatic, visible changes to the campus. They purchased and installed the victory bell rung at RIT hockey games and bought the tiger cub that is currently immortalized in statue form on the Quarter Mile.

The members of Alpha Phi Omega planned to camp out for three days (24 hours a day) to raise money for Harbor House, a Rochester non-profit organization founded in 2008, designed to help families of hospital patients who are receiving care in Rochester hospitals. Prolonged hospital stays can be difficult on commuting patients and their families; therefore, according to their website, Harbor House exists to provide a "home away from home" for these patients. The organization provides the patients and their families with support and temporary lodging. The facility is located on 89 Rossiter Road, which is less than half a mile from Strong Memorial Hospital.

Even though it meant camping in cardboard boxes, Alpha Phi Omega did not seem to have a problem getting volunteers for their event. Throughout the three days, one could find groups of small and large stationed outside the shantytown, patiently waiting for donations. And, judging from the many glances from students, the cardboard houses and colorful signs did seem to serve a purpose: attracting attention for the cause.

Student opinion, however, seemed to be mixed. "They're not even trying to explain what they're doing," said Will Kinchelov, a first year Photography major, who saw Alpha Phi Omega while he was walking to class. "It doesn't seem like they're doing anything." This was a commonly expressed opinion heard from people walking down the Quarter Mile. Passersby went about their business as usual, with curiosity in the cardboard town only briefly holding their interest. Indeed, the groups seemed rather quiet at times, perhaps attracting attention with their boxes instead of singing, dancing and yelling, as is often seen at other charity events.

This is an annual event, and it has a history at RIT. "I've talked to alumni [who] were here 20 or so years ago, and they sometimes ask whether or not we're still doing shantytown, and of course we say yes," explained Kari Hazzard, a sixth year International Business and Economics major and member of Alpha Phi Omega. "It used to be in the winter, during the middle of the quarter, and ultimately it was moved to the beginning of the spring quarter because it was beginning to pose a safety issue."

One question still remains: why a shantytown? Hazzard paused before saying, "I don't necessarily know why we do this specifically ... Some of the social fraternities sometimes do camping and whatnot. This is what we do."

SG ELECTIONS TIMELINE

Student Government released a calendar for SG elections outlining when specific events relevant to elections will occur. Applications will be available to all who are eligible and interested in the Campus Center (room 1710) up until March 26 at 12:00 p.m.

On March 18 and 19, there will be a "Meet & Greet" for prospective candidates at 6:00 p.m. and 3:00 p.m., respectively. Voting will start on April 19 at 12:00 a.m. and will close on April 22 at 11:59 p.m. To cast your vote, go to <http://sg.rit.edu/vote>. The winners will then be announced on April 23 at the end of the regularly held SG meeting. More information on running and voting for SG can be found via the SG bylaws, accessible from <http://rit.edu/sg/media>.

MORE SEATS FOR NTID?

There is concern in Student Government that the NTID Student Congress (NSC) representative and the NTID college senator in SG do not adequately represent cross registered students due to the specialized nature of their needs and culture. While the NSC representative and NTID senator in SG represent the particular needs of students out of class and in NTID, the proposed cross-registered representative would be responsible for the academic needs of the students in other colleges.

Teraisa Chloros, director of Student Relations, argued that this representation would create issues. Other groups such as transfer students (who may also feel voiceless) would then try to achieve representation for their specific groups as well, said Chloros. The intention was to vote during the meeting on the additional NTID representative so that the seat would be in the upcoming SG elections. The issue was tabled until next week so that senators could have time to learn more about the issue.

STUDENTS SPEAK UP DAY PROPOSAL

Students Speak Up Day was proposed by SG to take place on April 7 or April 14. This event would feature a campus wide set of surveys distributed via various media to encourage communication between the staff and student bodies, thusly improving RIT through student feedback. This opportunity could give the students the opportunity to express their opinions and possible improvements. A wide selection of colleges and committees would be asked to participate in the events, and the information collected would be sent to the respective organizations in order to better suit the needs and requests of the student body. The top three students who are deemed the most helpful in terms of feedback are proposed to have dinner with President William Destler in his residence at Liberty Hill. R

“Abraham Lincoln: Vampire Hunter”

Seth Grahame-Smith

Carefully concealed under his long black jacket, Abraham Lincoln kept an arsenal of hunting knives, cloves of garlic, a quiver of stakes, and a flask of holy water. Why? Honest Abe, the 16th president of the United States, the “Great Emancipator,” was one of the greatest vampire hunters of his age.

Alright, alright. We all know that’s not true. But ... think about it. Wouldn’t it be cool? If this batty premise appeals to you, Seth Grahame-Smith’s latest novel, “Abraham Lincoln: Vampire Hunter,” is a must-read.

Alternative history Abraham Lincoln’s journey begins with the death of his mother under some very suspicious circumstances. Upon learning the true cause of her death, young Abe vows to kill every vampire in America. Following an encounter with the lone survivor — so to speak — of Roanoke Colony, Lincoln goes on a vengeance-fueled killing spree. His lifelong hunt culminates in the bloodiest war in American history.

Stylistically, the writing of “Abraham Lincoln: Vampire Hunter” mimics the biographical works of Doris Kearns Goodwin and David McCullough, complete with asterisk-marked footnotes to elaborate on particularly pertinent vocabulary and historical details. Excerpts from Lincoln’s purported long lost personal journals provide the basic plot structure, fleshed out by some rather gruesomely descriptive narration. Though the fiction was somewhat pulpy at times, I really sunk my teeth into the historical bits.

At several points in the story, I had to put the book down and look things up. (Was Mary Todd’s father really a slave trader? Did Lincoln honestly pal around with Edgar Allen Poe?) As one might expect from a book titled “Abraham Lincoln: Vampire Hunter”, the line between fiction and reality was somewhat negotiable. Still, it was clear that Grahame-Smith had done his research; the fact that his writing had me running out to do the same is a sign of how compelling the novel is.

My advice? Go out and pick the book up now. Directors Tim Burton and Timur Bekmambetov are currently working on a movie adaptation. No studio is involved yet, but — just like any vampire story — we know there are only two possible outcomes: it will be really, really awesome, or it will really, really suck.

“The Brutalist Bricks”

Ted Leo and the Pharmacists

With a mix of rock, punk, and a kicking feel-good sound, Ted Leo and the Pharmacists return with a new album after nearly three years out of the studio. Released on March 9, “The Brutalist Bricks” continues with Ted Leo’s pseudo-falsetto, politicized lyrics and trademark guitar riffs. This time, the album has a mix of songs that exemplify Ted Leo’s musical capabilities, pulling influences from early punk rock and folk.

“The Brutalist Bricks” starts off with a style familiar to any Ted Leo fan: a catchy, infectious sound that makes you feel good to be alive. From there, most songs tend to blend a mix of in-your-face guitar riffs reminiscent of his previous work and a more laid back, subtle mix of guitar and bass. As a whole, the album is remarkably consistent; although most of the tracks aren’t exactly full hits, there aren’t any full misses either. But after a few listens, even the less catchy tunes start to grow on you.

Even though majority of the songs on the album are quite appealing, only a few are actually memorable, and even less, if any, will make it onto the Ted Leo greatest hits list. It tends to follow in the same expressive style that the band is known for, yet lacks any new creative input which would set this record apart from previous albums. Despite these flaws, “The Brutalist Bricks” is enjoyable, giving a more raw sound to Ted Leo’s repertoire. Unfortunately, it provides nothing majorly new or different than what we’ve heard before.

Album | Post-Punk | 37 mins.
"Novels"
 The Burning Hotels

Sometimes, we have to do things that we don't want to. It's an inevitable fact, part of the mundane ins and outs of daily living. Right now, I'm waiting for hundreds of gigabytes of data to back up as I prepare to install a new operating system on my computer. Times like these are when I reach for something like "Novels" by The Burning Hotels. The album provides perfect ambiance for almost any task; driving rhythms and melodies that are equal parts haunting and sunny — bittersweet, almost — are the order of the day here. The post-punk use of simple melody and chord progressions means that you can half-listen while working on other things; but when you do devote your full attention to the music, you start to notice the subtleties of the sound and the thoughtfulness of the lyrics. "Novels" is the sort of album that conjures up memories of summer evenings spent driving too fast and eating ice cream on the beach with your friends — moments ending just when you want them to last forever. There's a melancholy to it, but a fond nostalgia as well. Song wise, the album starts strong, setting the pace with "Austin's Birthday" and not slowing down for the remainder. Songs like "First Love" and "Where's My Girl" are memorable, catchy and innovative. In all fairness, I have a weakness for post-punk. I went through a phase where Bloc Party, The Strokes, The Rakes, and Hard-Fi were all staples of my music listening, and I still love that music today. But there's a purity here that I haven't heard in ages and that really hammered the point home to me: this novel is a gem. If you hear me humming a tune as I walk down the Quarter Mile in the next week or so, this is probably the album it came from.

"This Addiction"
 Alkaline Trio

Over the past 14 years, Chicago's Alkaline Trio has risen to cult-like status with their endearing brand of melancholy punk rock. The band bridges the gap between pop heaven and punk hell with their strong melodic sensibility and devil-may-care attitude.

Hyped as a return to their roots, their seventh album, "This Addiction," trades in the more slickly produced alt-rock sound of the band's latest efforts for the less-is-more attitude of their early career. The result isn't their finest, but it's a record worthy of both the band's discography and listeners' attention. "This Addiction," the album opener and title track, slams out of the speakers with a quick tempo reminiscent of vintage Trio, complete with rowdy guitar, bouncing bass and rapid-fire drumming. Despite some lyrical shortcomings, this fun, three-chord romp sets the tone for the record. From here on, "This Addiction" alternates between tight, punk-wrapped rock numbers and darker, bitter-hearted ballads that has guitarist Matt Skiba's recent divorce as a common theme. Bassist Dan Andriano only sings three of the 11 songs, which is a shame since he seems to be becoming the stronger songwriter. While Skiba's lyrics rely heavily on gory imagery and pitch black humor, Andriano takes a more honest, introspective approach. It's a juxtaposition that continues to serve them well. From the cheeky Ramones-esque "Dine, Dine my Darling" to the bleaker than bleak "Dorothy," the band keeps things interesting. Standout tracks include the dark and dynamic political anthem, "The American Scream" and "Off the Map," whose chorus gradually grows more robust.

Andriano closes the record with "Fine," probably the album's brightest track. Armed with Derek Grant's powerful drumming and a sentimental ache, this mid-tempo ode to growing up perfectly captures this band's unique attitude. "It's a love that gives me heartburn / it's a song that makes my stomach turn / and I wouldn't trade my hand / for all the aces in the deck." While nothing groundbreaking, "This Addiction" is a catchy and well-rounded modern punk effort that its blood-soaked sing-alongs should satiate fans old and new until next time. Keep em' coming.

Pulling the Big Switch

RIT's Change to Semesters

by Brendan Cahill, Jesse Hanus and John Howard with additional reporting by Andy Rees | illustrations by Lee Fitzgerald

On Feb. 10, in a lecture room filled with students, a psychology professor droned into the second hour of class. The students' eyes had already started to glaze over when the professor looked up.

"I'm going to be bad," the professor said, reading a message off her computer screen. "I just heard. RIT is switching to semesters. It's official."

From that point on, the campus was abuzz with news and protest. First year students expressed anxieties of not being able to finish college in time; alumni wrote letters; "5 by 3" became vernacular.

A little over one month later, the campus has begun to settle down. The RIT community has divided itself into three distinct groups. Some are hopeful and curious. Others are in downright denial. Many are apathetic, reasoning, "Well, I'll graduate before then, so it doesn't matter." Regardless, the decision has been made. Change will happen, and with it will come a turning point in RIT's history – for students, for faculty members, and for the Institute as a whole.

The Institute:

"I think the big concern was not so much semesters versus quarters," explained Amit Ray, associate professor in the RIT's English department and chair of the President William Destler's ad hoc Committee on Semester Planning. "The big concern was having a quarter calendar that made sense. And frankly, the one that we have didn't make sense for a number of reasons."

One major concern with the current quarter system was the mid-winter holiday break. Having a two-week vacation after three weeks of class has a negative effect on student information retention. Although professors do take measures to accommodate for this problem, the number of withdrawals, D's and F's is significantly higher during the winter term. "For example," said Ray, "What I've done is that I teach a sort of mini-course, and then I teach the rest of the course afterwards because it's so hard to connect back in."

In the midst of last year's winter quarter, a series of revised quarter calendars went through governance with no resolution. The current system was not liked in the governance groups, but the alternatives were not well received, either.

"After this had all gone through, and there wasn't any clear voice at the Institute Council, Bill [President Destler] decided to just throw out there 'how many of you would vote for a semester option if it was on the table?' and the majority of hands went up," said Ray. The administration came to realize that with so many factors in play: RIT's students, faculty, RIT's interaction with other universities; it didn't make sense not to give semesters serious consideration.

According to Ray, only four other institutions currently have a quarter calendar set up like RIT's, and they are all small schools without RIT's national profile.

The change from quarters to semesters is going to bring RIT into uncharted territory. "It's a huge process," admitted Ray. "It will be tough. It will be laborious. It will require people at every level thinking." While Destler and Provost Jeremy Haefner have presented several broad initiatives to aid in the transition to semesters, the details are not yet set in stone. The next six months will be spent gathering feedback from the RIT community and working out the implementation plan.

On Nov. 1, 2009, the Committee on Semester Planning submitted the "RIT Semester Conversion Report" (available through RIT's website), drafting a plan for RIT's possible move to a semester-based academic calendar. Most notably, the committee suggested the creation of at least eight new ad hoc committees to work with pre-existing committees and governance groups to ensure that the transition is as smooth as possible. These committees will have responsibilities ranging from determining the roles of advisors and how they will help students with schedules impacted by the changeover, to modifications that must be made to SIS, to communicating the process to students and staff so that everyone is aware of each step taken.

The Student:

Current freshmen in five-year majors, and every subsequent student who enrolls at RIT after 2013, the target date for conversion completion, will be impacted by the change. For those students, Ray offers some reassurance: In addition to lots of advising, the plan is to set up one-time transitional classes that will bridge the gap if you are, say, in the middle of a class sequence or need to take classes in your final year under the new system. Still, if RIT's quarters are all one is familiar with, it may be difficult to imagine life under the semester system.

Dane Britcher is a senior at St. John Fisher College, majoring in Management with a concentration in General Business Management. He is currently enrolled in six classes, which, at three credits each, total 18 credit hours. He also works anywhere from two to 10 hours per week at his school's admission office. Some weekends, he even has the time to go home and work 10 to 30 hours.

Students are able to choose from three different types of schedules at St. John Fisher: Classes that meet three times per week at 50 minutes each, classes that meet twice per week at 80 minutes each, or classes that meet once per week at three hours each. St. John Fisher only requires 12 credits to be considered a full-time student but, according to Britcher, the average student takes about 15 credits.

Even with these options, it can still become hectic. Britcher's busiest days might be reminiscent of a typical RIT day on quarters:

9:30 a.m. Advertising
 10:50 a.m. Buyer Behavior
 12:30-3:00 p.m. Library time
 (studying, assignments, etc.)
 3:30 p.m. Strategic Management
 4:50 p.m. Psychology
 6:15 p.m. Professional Selling
 9:30 p.m. Done for the day

In regard to workload, Britcher said that each semester, his professors provide an appropriate amount of material, if not more. In the 100-200 course level, the first week is often introductions, but this is not the case in higher-level courses.

"Three hundred level and above, any course will get right into the material the first day," Britcher said. Even with this quick start to the semester, Britcher finds the workload manageable. However, he said that the semester can feel quite long, especially toward the end. He thinks that quarters may have an advantage in this particular area by being able to break up the year more.

One aspect Britcher does enjoy with semesters at St. John Fisher is how his breaks match up with most other colleges. While he does have friends who attend RIT, he often finds it difficult to meet up with them due to different break schedules.

However, Britcher did point out that his friends at RIT do seem happy with the quarter system and voiced his concern with whether or not the switch to semesters is being done for the benefit of the students.

"If their [RIT] student body is hoping to stay with quarters, and they switch to semesters I think that kinda stinks," Britcher said. "I hope they're doing it for the students and not just for other reasons."

"It's a necessary and it's a good switch, even though it won't effect me," said Jake Maynard, a second year New Media Marketing student, planning on graduating in 2012. Most of the concerns that he's heard focus on classes and scheduling. "They [my friends] are worried about the number of classes they'll have to take."

The Professor:

With such a strong student response to the semester conversation, it's easy to lose track of the other end of the classroom. And naturally, a new timeline lends itself to new ways of teaching.

Mary Lynn Broe has been RIT's Caroline Werner Gannett Professor of Humanities since the position was created in 2006. The Caroline Werner Gannett Project brings a series of lecturers to RIT every year. Along with her dedication to the project, she regularly teaches the courses of "Auto/Biography" and "Maps, Spaces and Places." Compared to the rest of her career as a college-level instructor, Broe is relatively new to the quarter system.

"For over 30 years, I only taught in semester systems, but at a range of different colleges and universities," said Broe. Those universities include the likes of Notre Dame, SUNY Binghamton, and Grinnell College where she held the position of Louise Rosenfield Noun endowed chair from 1986 to 2002.

Though she admits to some skepticism within RIT's faculty, which can vary from college to college, Broe welcomes the change.

"I see no problem and only gains," Broe said.

She looks forward to using the extra classroom time to flesh out concepts and ideas, as well as add learning activities inside and outside of the RIT campus. To Broe, a ten-week term is limiting; courses examining writing across more than one century or even involved areas of psychology can only present a basic overview. In addition, the change would allow room to make use of the arts and cultural resources of Rochester community, bringing in experts for new areas of experience.

Broe is not unfamiliar with both sides of the argument. The quarter system can be beneficial in capturing students' short attention spans and allowing them to explore other areas of study. However, a looser calendar will not only allow time for more in-class exploration and discussion, but also for personal development outside the classroom and more industry-standard co-op options. Though a quarter system allows time for a greater number of co-ops, most employees prefer more time than 10 weeks, forcing students to double-block co-op slots. However, one of the more overlooked points is the opportunity for cross-disciplinary ventures, which both Broe and Ray can agree is a key advantage.

"Transformative changes in technology, in science, in really any field of human endeavor ... are going to take place across disciplinary boundaries," said Ray.

Ray worries that RIT is currently producing alumni who are very knowledgeable about what they learned, but lack the interdisciplinary skills that the modern world demands. He hopes that as professors examine their classes and curricula, changing them to fit a semester schedule, they will work together and use this change as a paradigm shift making RIT a model university for a rapidly changing era. RIT's current students are what Ray describes as "digital natives," (adding that he doesn't particularly like the vagueness of that term), integrating technology into our lives from an early age, and RIT needs to capitalize on the insights that technology gives us.

Broe emphasized this importance of keeping an eye on the "big picture" in the classroom. The move to semesters will allow a fresh look at how subjects are taught at RIT, and it is important to keep in mind what new techniques – including what is taught, with whom, and where – that were not possible before.

"Some of the 'trim-the-fat' diehards may be forced to become more contemplative, more rangy in looking at other disciplines and their impact on the subject being taught," said Broe.

So is RIT really on track to change to semesters in 2013?

"We will be," said Ray, "If we're going to commit to this, we will be committing to it fully, and it will be institute wide." Plus, he said, President Destler wouldn't have it any other way. Ray assures the RIT community that the process will not fall behind schedule. Meetings within different programs of study are already taking place. R

Common Misconceptions:

Ray addressed certain misconceptions students have since the early days of the debate, including:

- The voice of the students was ignored.
- The co-op program will be changed for the worse.
- The expense of this changeover will cause tuition to increase.
- This will ruin RIT's reputation of producing young professionals used to working in a fast paced, rigorous environment.

Addressing them in the order listed above, Ray said the following: Said Ray, "Based on the comments that I saw, it's sad to say this, but students were woefully ignorant about the change." This is why, Going forward, Ray hopes for much clearer communication between the deciding committees and the rest of RIT.

According to Ray, there used to be five schools with co-ops and a quarter system, and that three of them have already switched to semesters, laying the groundwork for RIT's change. According to Ray, employers generally also prefer longer co-ops. While students will not be able to schedule as many co-ops as in the past, they will still get the same or better experience.

"Cost will not increase."

As far as the pace of RIT's classes, Ray stated, "I don't think the culture changes based on the calendar." RIT students expect to be challenged; even with major scheduling changes, cultural precedents are already in place and will not shift overnight. I think that, ultimately, the cultural precedent for students demanding of faculty a pace of work, that doesn't ebb and flow, but continues." And of course, RIT's faster pace is not always beneficial, as it tends to rob courses of depth.

5x3 model:

Students will take five, 3 credit courses per semester for a total of 15 credits. Some courses will vary number of credits, but the norm is 3.

History:

This will be the second academic calendar switch for RIT and the second time the institute uses a semester system. The academic year of 1954-1955 marked the initial change to a quarter system. Before that RIT ran on semesters. Until 1976 the institute moved from early to late starting quarters until arriving at the current early start system in effect today.

CONTRASTING EDUCATION: THE OTHER ENGLISH

by Justin Claire | Photograph by Mohamed Sadek

The gestation of a brand new calendar at RIT brings the opportunity of a clean slate of how to run things academically. New ways of classroom procedure, instructing techniques, and course immersion are only a brainstorm away. However, like any new process, finding and mastering a system that works at RIT will require learning from programs that have already achieved success.

Every year, the Times Higher Education-QS publishes a list ranking the world's top 200 higher education institutions. Among the top 10 are six American universities, including the predictable ivy leagues like Princeton, Yale, and the leader, Harvard. However, the other four are from a different part of the world entirely. Wearing their colors proud, University of Cambridge, University of Oxford, the Imperial College London, and University College London rank high on this list; the names representing a strong force in the world of higher education worth shining some light on: the United Kingdom.

Neil Hair is uniquely qualified to comment on the differences between academics in the United Kingdom and the United States. A professor at the Saunders College of Business, he hails from Oxford and holds his Ph.D. in Management from Cranfield University. After teaching an exchange program of RIT students in 1998, he permanently moved to the States in 2004. "There are things I miss about the U.K. system; I miss being able to take my freshmen out for a beer," Hair said. "If I asked any of my incoming freshmen here if they'd like to go for a beer, they'd probably fire me and send me back to England pretty quickly."

He laments the lack of social interaction between students and professors outside of class; in America, the student-professor relationship is much more professional. Students hardly say a word to their professors outside of office hours or via email. He encourages a more personal interaction, and with about 80 percent of his students adding him on Facebook or LinkedIn, it seems to be catching on.

But that isn't to say that he prefers the British system. Hair is quick to sing Brick City's praises. British professors must endure a tiresome procession of bureaucrats to make any changes to their curriculum, and any deviation from the norm is scrutinized carefully and exhaustively. A simple change to the syllabus in England could take up to a year or more.

The small class size at RIT is also a welcoming change for a professor who enjoys a very personal teaching style; in England, universities with class sizes smaller than 200 students are rare. The intimate, in-class connection that students and professors have at RIT gives rise to a whole host of phenomena that are relatively uncommon across the pond.

"I don't want to spend 10 weeks training someone to be really good in the workforce, and then never hearing from them again. I want to know how they've done," said Hair. A great professor can be enough to make you take the next class in the sequence, concentrate in his specialty, or even change your major. But if you're one of 200 students in the lecture hall, that opportunity is all but lost.

However, the small class size can also make students feel singled-out, or personally antagonized; here we have the other side of the coin. You know it as "My Professor Hates Me," the belief that your grades are unreasonable or unfairly low, and you're being penalized for some esoteric, arcane reason known only to your grader. Not only does the large lecture size make singling out students a near-impossibility, there is a specific system in the U.K. that virtually eliminates this practice.

"It was not up to me to provide final grades in my class; in fact, I rarely graded any student work in my class," said Hair. "It was always graded by somebody else who taught in the same program." This protects the grades of students from being influenced by their personality.

Of course, it's not without its flaws. As Hair pointed out, the other grader isn't aware of any personal issues you might be facing or might place greater emphasis on areas that were covered in his section but not yours. In cases where a student's average hovers between two letter grades, a professor who knows you well is more likely to bump you up, just because he knows you're giving it your all.

Hair also touched upon England's reliance on traditional testing. Overseas, it's not at all unheard of for a final examination to count for 100 percent of your average. If you're bad at testing, "you're pretty much screwed." RIT and similar universities give more opportunities to break up the grading system with things like projects, homework averages, a smattering of quizzes and tests. A gestalt of different work you've done over the semester (and it is semesters, not quarters) makes getting an A that much more doable.

In the U.K., all undergraduates have the opportunity to complete a thesis project, a final opportunity to put into practice all the information they've learned and all the methodology they've practiced. Hair misses this opportunity that is not all-inclusive between majors at RIT. It makes a lovely capstone on a bachelor's degree, demonstrating practical ability that dovetails with academic excellence.

With each system having its advantages, Hair is ambivalent about which system is better.

"There are aspects that I miss about the U.K. system, definitely, but there are also aspects that I would certainly miss if I wasn't teaching under the U.S. system," he said. "Ultimately, I think, like everything else, it comes down to the student, and how committed they are to the work." R

While You Were Out: Spring Break Sports Recap

by Alex Rogala

For most RIT students, the spring break was a time of rest and relaxation and a chance to kick back for a week after a hectic quarter. However, for some RIT athletes, this was not the case; with spring break, the crossroads between winter and spring sports, many teams spent their week away from academics either finishing or beginning their season. For those who spent break away from the Rochester chill, here are some of the highlights.

Baseball

The RIT Baseball Team headed off to Phoenix, Ariz. for the RussMat Invitational, where they played a series of seven games.

RIT faced a rocky start in their first match, losing 14-1 against Saint John's on March 1. Despite some fierce fighting, the team only managed four hits over the course of the game.

The following day, the Tigers faced St. John's again in another two games, losing 5-3 in the first and 6-3 in the second. During the first game, fourth year Packaging Science major Geoff Dornes became RIT's all-time career leader, breaking RIT alum Andy Shield's (1999-2002) previous record of 160.

On March 3, the Tigers scored their first win of the season, a 5-1 match once again against St. John's. Scoring all five of their runs by the top of the fourth inning, the team managed a season high of 10 hits.

After a day off, they continued this winning streak as they won their second straight game, an 8-5 win against the College of New Jersey on Friday, March 5. The game featured solid plays from the Tigers, who never trailed throughout the course of the game.

Despite this high, RIT closed out the invitational with a series of two losses to Rockford. In the first game (12-5), RIT quickly assumed the lead in the first inning, maintaining it until the third inning. During the second game, the team managed a 10-1 lead by the third inning; yet just when it seemed like a win was in reach, Rockford stepped up the pace, closing the game 20-11. The Tigers' next game will be a home game against Keuka on March 21.

Men's Hockey

On February 26, the RIT Men's Hockey Team defeated Canisius 8-0. Continuing this winning streak the next night, the team wrapped up their season with a 5-4 victory against Canisius on February 27. This was the sixth consecutive game in the streak with five different members of the team scored.

Men's Lacrosse

The RIT Men's Lacrosse team lost their first match on March 3 against Stevenson University, 20-10. The Tigers had gained an early lead in the first quarter before Stevenson picked up the pace in the second.

Despite a 4-1 lead during the first period, the team lost once again to Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute on Saturday, March 6. Following setbacks in the second quarter, RIT gained goals once again in the third quarter before RPI caught up during the fourth, scoring the winning goal with just one minute left.

Men's Track and Field

The RIT Men's Track and Field team wrapped up their season at the ECAC Championship on Friday, March 6 and Saturday, March 7 at Smith College in Northampton, Mass.

Overall, the team finished 13 out of 49, taking home first for the pole vault and fifth for the long jump.

Among the highlights was third year Michael Dempsey's pole vault, setting a new record of 5.02 meters (16 feet, 5 inches). Due to his performance, Dempsey was invited to the 2010 NCAA Division III Indoor Track and Field Championships in Greencastle, Ind.

Softball

Like their baseball counterparts, the RIT Softball Team chose a far-sunnier location for their spring break, heading to Orlando, Fla. for the Rebel Spring Games. Here, the Tigers proved themselves to be formidable opponents, winning seven of their 10 games.

Despite an initial 2-0 lead, the Tigers eventually lost their first game — a match against Alverno College on February 27 — when Alverno hit a run in the bottom of the fourth inning, followed up by four more in the fifth. Later the same day, the team faced Ferrum College, winning 4-3.

On Sunday, February 28, the team split again, winning a 8-4 victory over Walsh before a 1-0 loss against York. Although RIT loaded all the bases in the first inning, three outs went by quickly before York managed to score in the second inning.

However, the team quickly recovered from this loss, scoring two wins against Widner on Monday, March 4. On Wednesday, March 6, the team scored two more wins against Clark and Beloit, respectively 6-3 and 5-3. On Thursday, the team won against St. Benedict, before losing 6-0 against York. The softball team's next game will be a home game against the University of Rochester on March 25.

Women's Hockey

The team scored a 5-0 win against SUNY Potsdam on March 27, the ninth in a streak. RIT scored three times in the first 8:40 of the game. The first round of the ECAC West Tournament, this is RIT's first playoff as a member of ECAC West.

On March 6, the Lady Tigers traveled to Elmira for a 2-1 loss that ultimately ended their nine-game winning streak. Elmira scored early into the game, leaving RIT trailing until the third period, when third year Hospitality major Sarah Dagg scored RIT's lone goal. Eventually, Elmira scored a second goal 5:10 into overtime, ending the match.

Women's Lacrosse

In their first match, the Women's Lacrosse team obliterated North Carolina Wesleyan in a 22-1 win on March 2. Throughout the groundbreaking game, the team shattered seven single-game records: goals, points, assists, fewest goals allowed, fewest shots allowed, fewest shots allowed in a half, and most goals scored in one half. Fifteen different players scored at least one point, with a strong defense that only allowed a single goal during the second half.

The next day, on March 3, the team earned a 19-13 win against Guilford. A fiercely played game, RIT managed 11 goals in the first half and outshot Guilford 47-23.

Women's Track and Field

The RIT Women's Track and Field team also spent the weekend before break at the ECAC Championship at Smith College. RIT finished 33rd out of 42 teams at the meet, acquiring five points.

Due to her performance in the championship, second year Jennifer Adams was selected to represent RIT at the 2010 NCAA Division III Indoor Track and Field Championships in Greencastle, Ind. R
