Cube Woman's

5-step plan to becoming a great art critic

1. give each work a quick (2 second) glance. if your eye is caught by some slick visual effect, keep that particular work in the running. immediately toss out all work that fails to use bright colors, that lacks a concrete subject, or that takes too much time to interpret.
2. sum up each remaining piece in one simple statement. take a random guess at the artist's intent to help you.
3. shout out your opinion on each piece in the form of a joke. when others laugh, it's time to eliminate the current piece from the running.
4. if others in the group agree that a work is poor, stick with the majority's opinion, as several concurring art critics are sure to be right.
5. when you've narrowed the work down to the set amount, carelessly chuck all of the losing pieces into a large box, for you've arrived at the only art worthy of existence!

boy i'll tell you, nothing beats sitting around and judging artwork. i recently participated in the reporter's annual "firing squad", a group that was in charge of choosing the work that appears in this All Art Issue. A lot of great work was submitted, but as with any art selection process, there were uncomfortable moments when it was not clear what the criteria for judgement were.

The people we had participating came from a variety of majors and had very different views on what quality art is. while this can be good for attaining a needed diversity of opinions, it creates an imbalance that can steer the selection of individual works in skewed directions.

for instance, some people think quality art should contain conventional subjects and be easy to understand. others respond well only to vibrant colors and other special effects; "eye candy" it is called. and yet others believe that art must "communicate", somehow grab your soul and feverishly speak to you and give you a reason to exist.

i believe art is highly personal, and there is rarely one definite interpretation that comes with a work. quality art is determined by many factors, and not all of those factors need to be present in a good piece. in order to really appreciate art, one must leave all expectations behind, and enter each experience with a mind that is wide open.

i personally am very pleased with the quality level of work present in this year's issue. but th, again, who am i to decide what's good?

Correction

An article about the 1998 Take Back the Night rally and march ("Stop the Violence! End the Silence!"), which appeared in the May 1 issue of Reporter, identified Beth Ann Bull as a speaker who "provided a personal account of her rape." In fact, the speaker was Beth Parker. The article also indicated that Vicki Hurtwitz "traveled from Seattle to participate in setting up facilities and resources for deaf and hearing impaired women of Rochester." This is incorrect. Hurtwitz was one of five deaf women who went to Seattle for a week to learn about the Abused Deaf Women's Advocacy Services (ADWAS) program. Reporter regrets the errors.
